In the heart of a quiet village stood a grand old banyan tree. Its branches spread wide, giving cool shade to everyone who came near. Children loved to play under it, farmers rested there after a long day, and travelers found shelter beneath its leaves during the rain.

One day, a woodcutter came to the village. Seeing the huge tree, he thought, "If I cut this tree, I'll get enough wood to sell in the market for weeks!" He lifted his axe, ready to strike.

Just then, an old man who often sat under the tree stopped him. "This tree has given shade, fruits, and peace to many," he said. "If you destroy it, you will gain money for a few days but lose a friend forever."

The woodcutter looked at the villagers resting nearby, at the birds chirping happily in the branches, and at the calm face of the old man. Slowly, he put down his axe. From that day, he promised never to harm a tree again.

The banyan stood tall, proud, and thankful — a silent guardian of the village's kindness and wisdom.
